Marine Offshore Safety & Survival

4-5 hours classroom and lab training, 3.5 hours pool or lake training

Program Overview

All employees required to work or travel on marine vessels are required to have vessel safety and offshore survival training. This program focuses on safety in an offshore ocean environment for a variety of vessels. This includes oil platform workers, seismic vessels, research ships and passenger transport. Training consists of classroom lectures dealing with industrial marine offshore survival, hands on exercises using rescue/safety devices, and includes a water session to allow students to practice use of PFDs, immersion suits, rafts and rescue devices.

Classroom Training

Classroom training addresses worker requirements for being familiar with the vessels emergency alarms, basic fire fighting, and emergency life support equipment. Students practice donning PFDS, survival suits, and immersion suits. They receive hands-on experience with life raft equipment to include water supplies, food rations and electronic beacons. A session of the training also instructs medical responses for drowning and hypothermia.

Water Training

During the afternoon pool or lake session, students are initially exposed to drown proofing techniques and the usage of temporary improvised flotation. The water crews then practice PFD and survival suit donning, survival swimming techniques, rescue throw bag usage and the practice of overboard rescues. Students also board a life raft and a Zodiac style rescue boat, as well as practice boarding of the USCG helicopter rescue basket. This is an active session that truly provides the experience needed for offshore work.
